REVIEW: THE TWIN DILEMMA 38

We present a review of the last adventure of last season, which introduced Colin Baker as the Sixth Doctor.

THE BRIAN OF MORBIUS?

Just thought I'd drop you a line about the picture on page 17 of issue 89, accompanying the article on Morbius. You quite rightly pointed out in the caption that Gilly Brown played Ohica in The Brain of Morbius, but the picture wasn't of the aforementioned lady, but of Cynthia Grenville as Maren. Spot the Deliberate Mistake Time, huh?

I was also interested to see you describe Morbius (on the credits page) as a renegrade Time Lord. Some obscure High Gallifreyan word no doubt!

While I'm quibbling, I might as well mention one last thing. In the Elisabeth Sladen feature, you describe Alpha Centauri (Curse of/Monster of Peladon) as hideous. Quite apart from the fact that he/she/it was one of the good guys, compared to some of the other creatures the Doctor has encountered (Davros, the Krynoid etc) poor old Alpha Centauri is positively cuddly!

THE CENSORITES

I am writing because frankly I'm "cheesed off" at the ABC (Australian Broadcasting Corporation) and their actions towards The Caves of Androzani! At the end of the 4th episode of Planet Of Fire, the ABC apologised that the rest of the season's stories will not be shown till late June. According to them, they had 'transport problems'. This was about two months ago and only now, I find out that it was really due to Australian censors banning the final few scenes of Davison's last on account that they were too violent!

After an article in the Star Enquirer, I realized what the ABC was trying to cover up. There is rumour that the censors are making cuts, which in my opinion is not needed!

Now the ABC are screening Baker's last season and Davison's first. The censors could have at least told us without keeping it a secret. Now we'll have to wait until late June to see just what unnecessary processes have been going on while Australians have been impatiently watching repeats!

NAME THAT TUNE

I really enjoyed reading the Doctor Who Summer Special, a highly informative publication with lots of pretty pictures. One thing bothers me though, in the article Gallifreyan Grooves, devoted to Doctor Who records, I think to have omitted a particular disc. I seem to remember a song recorded in the Sixties by a four-piece group actually called The Doctor Who. As I recall it was a pop tune entitled My Regeneration, and the lyrics went something like this:

People always trying to put me down,
Just because I get around.
Talkin' 'bout my regeneration,
Fightin' monsters big 'n' bold,
I almost died before I got old,
Talkin' 'bout my regeneration. . .

Can you identify this song, or tell me anything about The Doctor Who (I think they must have split up ages ago)?

Mr T. Dactyle,
Chester,
Cheshire.

We've never heard (of) this record, Mr Dactyle. Are you sure you've got your facts right? Can any of our readers shed any light on the aforementioned song?

COMPLAINTS DEPARTMENT

My ten year old son is a Doctor Who addict and in many ways quite an authority on the subject. His pocket money is frequently spent on Doctor Who publications but naturally his resources are limited and I was astounded at the price of 95 pence being asked for the Summer Merchandise Special. This publication, as its title implies, is nothing more than a catalogue of memorabilia on the subject and is therefore purely advertising material.

Nevertheless, as my son along with another of his friends is soon to give an illustrated talk to his school on Doctor Who, he felt that this would be a useful edition to add to his collection.

Now as our "hero" has greatest appeal to school children too young to be earning "extra" pocket money it seems most unfair and even unnecessary to be charging such a high price for a comic.

Is it too much to assume that there will be sufficient revenue resulting from the sale of this Summer "Special" to enable Marvel Comics Limited to consider reducing the "normal" price of the more regular issues on a permanent basis?

I am sure I speak for many many thousands of parents who genuinely feel that they are being "conned".

Mr B. Tegg, Southcrest, Worcs.

Editor, Alan McKenzie, replies: "While, naturally, I sympathise with younger readers of Doctor Who Magazine who may find the higher cover price of our Summer and Winter Specials difficult to budget for, I should point out that the Merchandise Special is in no way "advertising" material. It was intended as a handy guide, for fans of the television show, to the vast amount of Who-related material past and present.*

"As to the price of the Summer Special, it is quite simply a matter of covering the cost of the high quality, colour printing involved in producing the magazine. The special includes twice as many colour pages as the regular Doctor Who Magazine. Since the price of printing black and white is negligible compared to the cost of printing colour, I feel that Marvel's Production Department did a heroic job in keeping the price of the Special as low as they did.

"I'm sorry you feel that you are being conned. But I can assure you that Marvel Comics, ever price-conscious, only wants to bring the best possible material at the lowest possible cover-price to the readers who, after all, keep us all in employment."

RELATIVES IN SPACE

Hate to bring up the subject of the Doc's relatives again, but I was surprised that no one had commented on the "New Adventure" in the Radio Times 20th Anniversary Special in which we get a relatively detailed account of the events and reasons for the Doctor's rapid departure from home, and how he found Susan (Lady Larn) as a stowaway, fleeing from being made Lord President at the age of seven because of her being a direct descendant of good old Rassilon. Is this a genuine history I wonder, or is it just another typical BBC plot to stop curious fans from asking questions?

Right, now that that point is cleared up, I wonder if I could ask a favour. You see, I looked forward to seeing last season's two-part story (The Awaken- ing). What with trailers on TV and previews in your excellent magazine, I was quite enthusiastic about it. However, as the week of its showing came, disaster struck!

Turning on the TV one day all that appeared was a great mass of snowy nothing, accompanied by a grating hiss. Oh no, I thought, classic example of main transmitter been smashed by Arctic snows and high velocity winds! Hasty 'phone calls to various friends confirmed the worst and so I resigned myself to a day, maybe two at the most, with no telly.

However, the day stretched to a week and resulted in The Awakening escaping our particular airwaves – hence my request. Could you possibly ask the Beeb (whom I'm sure sabotaged the Durris Transmitter just to annoy me!) if there are any immediate plans to re-show the story, either to our unfortunate area or as a nationwide repeat.

Arcalian Renegade,

Don't fret Arcalian, all is not lost! We have it on good authority that The Awakening, as a complete 50-minute adventure, will have a repeat screening nationwide on Wednesday, 18th July, in the early evening. Preceding this on the 6th and 13th July The King's Demons will be reshown in two parts.

WHO'S YOUR FAVOURITE?

I have been watching Doctor Who since it began back in 1963. I have seen many stories from each of the good Doctor's regenerations, but, for me, the Hartnell years bring back fondest memories.

From time to time you print letters where the writer states an actor as being their favourite Doctor (eg, Pertwee or Baker). This may be so, but I often wonder that when someone does state a preference for a favourite Doctor, have they been fortunate enough to have seen a good cross-section of stories from all of the Doctor's regenerations? In many cases, I think not.

Therefore anyone reading this letter, who at a future date may wish to write to Doctor Who Magazine stating a preference for a certain actor's interpretation of the Doctor, let us know from when they have been watching Doctor Who. It is grossly unfair to earlier regenerations, if a fan of a later Doctor has only watched the series from that particular regeneration and does not state it in their letter!

GALLIFREY GUARDIAN

RIGHT ON, TARGET!

MY THANKS as always to Christine Donougher of W.H. Allen for some interesting news about 1985 and a strictly provisional list of titles that are due for release next year, although nothing is certain yet (1985 is still a long way off!).

In no particular order: Eric Pringle has novelised The Awakening and Eric Saward has novelised The Twin Dilemma (no sign of Resurrection yet). Terrance Dicks (Doctor Who Magazine will print an interview with him later this year) will be writing The Krotons, The Mind of Evil and The Time Monster and John Lucarroti will be doing The Massacre to follow up Marco Polo and The Aztecs. Donald Cotton is now doing The Myth Makers (The Gunfighters will have to wait) and, great news here, Ian Marter will be handling that most requested of stories The Invasion – the classic Cyberman adventure that introduced UNIT and set the scene for the Earth-bound stories of the Pertwee era. Also out next year will be another non-fiction book as yet untitled but it will basically be a recipe book, with contributions from various people connected with the show. So if you want to find out what Colin Baker likes for dinner or what John Nathan-Turner eats at breakfast, here's your chance not only to find out what, but also how, they cook! The editor of the book is Gary Downie, was A.S.M. on Underworld, chronographer of Black Orchid. Oh and a reminder that later this month Ian Marter's latest adaptation of a Troughton story, The Dominators will be in the shops, along with the hardback version of Inferno, at £1.50 and £5.95 respectively. Printed here is the cover to Gerry Davis' The Highlanders. His long awaited Celestial Toymaker novel is now due sometime in 1985.

COMIC MART

SO BUSY WAS I last month giving you George Cairns' quote, which came from episode four of Revenge of the Cybermen that I omitted to mention that the quote in issue 89 was from episode four of The Claws of Axos.

This month a slight change – bearing in mind that much of this issue is devoted to Malcolm Hulke it seems apposite to take a quote from one of his works – but rather than a television story, this is from a book: "Actually two-headed species in the cosmos are very rare. There are the Deagles, a sort of two-headed bird like creature on one of the planets in the Asphasian Belt but I've only read about those. I haven't been there yet. . ." A prize is on its way to Vicky Tedstone in Cheltenham for that one. Don't forget, any quotes or pieces of news – send them into the editorial address on page 3, preferably on a postcard, please.

COMING NEXT SEASON

NOT A GREAT DEAL is known still about the next season of Doctor Who, but we now have a writer for the second story. The script has the working title of Vengeance on Varos and is written by Doctor Who newcomer Philip Martin. This story will be directed by Ron Jones.

A reminder that the first story is by Paul Moore, is called Attack of the Cybermen and is directed by Matthew Robinson who confirms that David Banks will once again play the Cyberleader – a role he has twice portrayed – in Earthshock and The Five Doctors. Filming for this story took place at the end of May somewhere in London and went into studio towards the end of June.

NEW MERCHANDISE

FROM NEW STORIES TO OLD, and BBC Video have confirmed that later this month they will be releasing a second Doctor Who story on video, both VHS and Betamax. The title is still unconfirmed as we go to press but the indications are that it will again feature the Tom Baker incarnation and features a Time Lord enemy – keep watching the shelves!

And keep watching the shelves in big toy shops for Stuart Evans' terrific Dalek Construction Kit. It comes in about eighty pieces waiting to be made up and you can create virtually any design of the Daleks seen on television from The Daleks through to the recent Resurrection of the Daleks. Fully completed, the model (it's not a toy, stresses Stuart, as the approximate £12 price tag proves) stands at around a foot high and comes complete in a colour box with a 500 word history of the Daleks inside. We hope to have more news on this shortly but again it is due out towards the end of this month – well worth a look at. Fine Art Castings in Hampshire are releasing a series of metal figures and Susan Moore, whom Christopher Crouch of BBC Merchandising mentioned in the Doctor Who Summer Special, is getting on well with her resin moulded figurines and we hope to have news on all these soon.

DOCTOR WHO AND THE SILURIANS

EPISODE ONE

A British atomic research station has been built into part of a network of caves and is now being plagued by various troubles The rate of mental breakdown amongst personnel is very high and there have been unaccountable losses of power One of the workers was killed on a pothoing expedition his companion is now in the sick bay in a state of shock capable only of drawing pictures of strange creatures on the wal

UNIT is called in and the Doctor and Liz join the Brigadier at the station They are not welcomed by Lawrence the director who resents his work being interrupted The deputy director Quinn seems to know more about the affair than he should and one of his assistants Miss Dawson says it is his duty to tell them' to stop taking the power The Doctor discovers that the centre s logs have been sabotaged Major Baker the security man, tells the Brigadier that he thinks there is organised sabotage from the inside

The Doctor after seeing the drawings of reptile like man, and hearing that the dead technician had wounds like the slashes of claws feels certain that the clue to the mystery lies in the caves He makes his way there and is attacked by a prehistoric monster

EPISODE TWO

The dinosaur like creature s called away by a fluting sound and the Doctor returns to the research centre to find that a full-scale search for him is about to be mounted

Quinn is relieved to hear that the search is to be called off but then the Brigadier decides to explore with armed men Baker seeing a man like figure raise its hand in what appears to be a threatening gesture fires and s attacked by a monster It s called off and he is only slightly hurt The Doctor takes samples of blood from the rocks and returns to the centre with the security man while the others continue to explore The Silurian escapes to the surface and takes refuge in a barn

Liz and the Doctor analyse the blood and discover resemblances to the larger reptiles ▶

Quinn pays a visit to the Silurian head quarters in the caves to warn them of the search. He demands the knowledge he has been promised but is told that first he must rescue the wounded Silurian. To help him do this he is given a summoning device.

At the farm the Silurian attacks the farmer and his wife when they enter the barn. When they hear this news the Doctor and his two friends go at once to the scene. The farmer is dead of heart failure caused by fright. Liz is left behind to do some tests while the others go to the hospital. From a drawing the farmer's wife identifies the attacker as a Silurian and says that it is still hiding at the farm.

Back at the barn Liz turns her head to see the Silurian behind her.

EPISODE THREE

The Silurian stuns Liz and leaves. When her friends find her she tells them that her attacker looked like a reptile but walked upright like a man.

Quinn arrives at the farm to find out what is happening and then leaves and makes an attempt to contact the Silurian. A soldier reports a strange noise like the one in the caves - and the Brigadier and the Doctor investigate. But Quinn has already made contact although the searchers find Silurian tracks, they end in car tyres.

The Doctor pays Quinn a visit and remarks on the heat of his cottage. The scientist claims that the thermostat has jammed, but refuses to let the Doctor look at it. Quinn is annoyed by a reference to the reptile house at the zoo, and does not rise to the Doctor's suggestion that if sensible people were willing to co-operate the trouble could be averted.

Back at the centre in Quinn's office, the Doctor breaks open a cabinet and discovers a globe of the world as it was two hundred million years ago.

Miss Dawson comes in and is on the verge of telling what she knows but is interrupted by the Brigadier. She goes to the cottage to persuade Quinn to confide in the Doctor. But he has the wounded Silurian in his power and intends to force the creature to give him its scientific knowledge.

The Doctor returns to the cottage to find the scientist dead with a map of the caves lying underneath him. As the Doctor examines it the Silurian comes through the door.

EPISODE FOUR

The Doctor makes a friendly approach to the Silurian and it leaves peacefully.

Baker knocks out his guard and returns to the caves where he is captured by the Silurians.

The Doctor goes back to the centre, and he and Liz leave for the caves.

He has kept Quinn's Silurian homing device and with its help they manage to enter the alien headquarters where they see Baker imprisoned in a cage like an animal. They also see a hibernating Silurian being revived, and the area where the dinosaur-like monsters are kept. They leave without being detected.

The Permanent Under Secretary Masters - the man responsible for the centre at the Ministry in London - arrives and Lawrence complains to him about the way the Brigadier is behaving.

The Doctor has to tell the others about the Silurians and Masters says that he cannot report back to Whitehall without tangible proof. The Brigadier decides that they must move into the caves the next morning. The Doctor feels that he must warn the Silurians, but at their headquarters he is put in a cage.

The Brigadier and his soldiers enter the caves and find themselves trapped by descending walls of rock.

While the Old Silurian the alien leader is willing to listen to reason, his second-in-command, the Young Silurian, wants to destroy the hated ape men. And he transfixes the Doctor with the rays emitted by his third eye

EPISODE FIVE

The Old Silurian puts a stop to this and takes the Doctor away. The Young Silurian strongly disapproves of this conciliatory move.

The Doctor learns how the Silurians went into hibernation when they saw the moon approaching the earth. The mechanism of the hibernation units was faulty, and did not function until a new source of energy — the generator at the research centre — began to operate. The Doctor feels that Silurians and humans could reach a compromise, and manages to persuade the leader to begin to co-operate by releasing the Brigadier and his men. But the Young Silurian believes in destruction and by remote control forces one of the soldiers to kill himself and he releases the monsters. Then he orders Baker to be infected with a deadly virus and released.

The Old Silurian warns the Doctor about what has happened, gives him a canister containing the virus, and sends him back to the centre to seek an antidote.

Baker arrives back, followed closely by the Doctor whom he accuses of treachery. Then he collapses.

When he learns what has happened the Young Silurian kills the leader and takes over.

The Doctor is horrified when he learns that Baker has been taken to the local hospital. With the Brigadier and Liz he leaves to bring the security man back but when they arrive at the hospital Baker is dead.

Masters decides that he must return to London. Both he and Lawrence are feeling off-colour.

EPISODE SIX

All those who have been exposed to infection are given an inoculation in the hope that it may be of some use. Masters has taken the virus to London and soon there are other cases there.

The Young Silurian decides that he must find and destroy the Doctor just in case he is capable of discovering a cure.

Masters dies, and soon there are more deaths among those with whom he has been in contact. Outbreaks of the disease are taking place all over London.

The Doctor, desperately working against time, at last finds an antidote.

The soldiers guarding the exits to the caves are attacked by monsters.

Using their third eyes to break through the solid rock walls the Silurian and the Silurian scientist penetrate to the laboratory where the Doctor has just written down the correct formula.

EPISODE SEVEN

The Doctor, stunned by the effect of the third eyes, is dragged away. The formula is left on the ground where it is found by ▶

Liz

Back in the aliens headquarters, the Doctor tells the Silurians that their plan has failed, but then he learns that this is only a preliminary move. They intend to make Earth uninhabitable for humans by using a deadly machine. This weapon will need power, and so the Doctor will be forced to reactivate the generator at the centre.

Thanks to Liz, the formula is being mass produced.

The Brigadier realises that while his men have been drawn into the caves their communications have been cut.

The Silurians break in with the Doctor, and picking up Liz and the Brigadier on the way, reach the Cyclotron room. The weapon is connected to the generator. The purpose of the machine is to destroy the Van Allen belt which protects the earth from the sun's rays, so rendering the planet too hot for humanity.

The soldiers in the caves are running out of ammunition when the Silurians decide to recall the monsters.

The Doctor asks Liz to help him by feeding uranium to the reactor. In an undertone he tells her to lower in the rods all at once. As she does this the control panel sparks and smokes. The Doctor tells the Silurians that there is going to be an explosion and a massive leakage of radiation. The whole area will be deadly for at least a quarter of a century.

The aliens decide to return to their base to wait in hibernation until the danger has passed. The humans are left behind to die.

At their base the Silurians are being rehibernated for fifty years. Because the mechanism is faulty one has to remain conscious. The Young Silurian passes his command to the Scientist, and stays awake to die.

The Doctor and Liz manage to correct the generator.

The Doctor goes to the alien base, and the Young Silurian, realising that they have been tricked, tries to kill him before reviving the others. But he himself is killed by the Brigadier.

The Doctor decides that he will revive the aliens one at a time so that they can impart their knowledge and learn to co-operate peacefully. But the Brigadier has his instructions from the Government. He blows up the base and so destroys the Silurians for ever. ■

THE MAKING OF THE SILURIANS

FEATURE BY RICHARD MARSON

DOCTOR WHO AND THE Silurians was a strange mixture of old and new a story that was still unresolved in many ways at the 1968 season end the programme's last and one which was, in some measure, breaking new ground and opening the way into the 1970s ahead of its chronological successor Spearhead From Space had been shot entirely on film because of a BBC strike. The result was a remarkably fast-moving and suspenseful thriller, one of the few to survive three stories, of which The Silurians was the first, were seven episodes long. This show consequently saw the debut of colour recording on the series, by the programme was still largely made on a weekly basis as it had been throughout by Hartnell and Troughton days. This meant that sets required week in week out had to be put up and taken down over maybe the entire seven weeks, it also meant that there was less time for rerecording, though the show already needed more time now that it was experimenting with new technological resources such as Colour Separation Overlay (CSO).

Two stories after these shortcomings were to some extent met by recording two episodes each outright out of doors on locations as a film production rather than contending with weekly production. The latter innovation was based on the difficulties the new producer of the series, Barry Letts, had with The Silurians and The Ambassadors of Death.

Letts had been brought on to the set as to take over from the departing Derrick Sherwin, joining midway through production of The Silurians in October 1969. The duration of Jon Pertwee's first season having been a trial for him, the series was also more film-based and adult orientated than ever before. This Letts experience in directing Doctor Who just over a year before The Enemy of the World was not as useful as it might have been.

Script editor Terrance Dicks commissioned a story from his friend and colleague Malcolm Hulke, giving him only one initial stipulation. He wanted a story set in caves. The reason for this was one of variety. Dicks realised the Earth/UNIT-based format could quickly stale without constant innovation and he wanted to use the locations available on Earth – and above all England – to the best possible advantage. Hulke did not fail him, coming up with a wonderfully original plot twist in the process – the Silurians regarded man as the invader of their planet and now they wanted it back. He chose their name rather than using the correct term of Eocenes, because he preferred its sound – however not being deaf to criticism when he came to pen The Sea Devils two years later he gave the Doctor a line of dialogue pointing out the error.

This story is the only one of the programme's history to feature the series' monsters alongside its individual title. This was an experiment which nobody really liked and it was dropped almost immediately with due regret.

The director was at the time a BBC staff employee Timothy Combe who had worked on Dickens' classic serial The Evil of the Daleks. His style was dynamic and geared to pace and suspense and it is for this reason that Combe elected not to show a Silurian creature until the end of episode three. Before this he merely suggested the presence or made the camera the Silurian's-eye view. For another reason this story is highly significant in the series development because it saw the first use of the CSO process which has since become a reliable standby for almost every director and producer of the programme. It was used to show a dinosaur standing beside the Doctor in the caves and as Barry Letts explained in the Doctor Who Winter Special the process was not without teething problems.

Visual effects saw in the script the requirement for a twenty foot monster," said Letts, "which they made in the customary way producing a man-sized dinosaur suit which because of its weight restricted the actor's movements and then animating it with CSO to make it seem large beside Jon Pertwee. It wasn't until a while afterwards that it dawned on everyone that there was no need to go to all the time and expense of building a full-sized suit. They could have achieved exactly the same effect using a puppet two feet tall operated by rods. Thus a hard case of learning the hard and expensive way.

Some of the cast of the story are well known. Doctor Who fans Peter Miles who played Davros returned as Professor Quinlan in Hulke's third appearance in the Dinosaurs. Despite his short and unpleasant role as Nyder in The Daleks' Master Plan James Warwick played Baker had not been seen before as Khrisong. The Abominable Snowman actor was to reappear as Hobson in The Mutants, The Macra Menace and then play Yrcanos after playing Master's show companion again in Part Two as the Australian actor in The Mutants. Two other well known TV soap faces Fiona Mackay of Peyton Place and Hal Dyer from Blake's 7 also appeared, having a large cast of the Silurians scaly disguised stunt humans.

The voices of the Silurians were realised by actor Peter Halliday and ensembled I you can imagine as a ragged Krotus. Not to be dubbed over unnecessarily the voices were not used in the Silurians' next appearance in Warriors of the Deep.

Costume designer was Christine Rawlins who had already worked on the show to great effect and did so in consultation with both make-up and visual effects to produce the Silurians. The suits made of rubber were surprisingly very flexible and constricting with enough pieces designed to move as the actor within spoke his lines. The Silurians also had a third eye which could unlock doors and cages in which event it glowed blue and which could also knock out stun opponents when it glowed red.

Set designer was the experienced Barry Newberry who had worked on the very first episode An Unearthly Child and more recently on The Awakening. The incidental music composer was Carey Blyton who created some deliciously haunting themes for The Silurians.

Because of an unfortunate production error Jon Pertwee was billed as Radio Times for Spearhead From Space although he did appear on the cover. As some sort of consolation the first episode of The Silurians concluded with a background feature on both Jon Pertwee and Bessie. This was the first show in which the popular yellow roadster appeared and she had been specially customised for the series' requirements.

The Silurians was very much the testing ground for the new Doctor. Whereas Spearhead from Space had been an adventure of exceptional pace, with new Doctor, companion, setting, format and monsters all introduced in one four-part story, The Silurians allowed time for a close examination of the new face of Doctor Who and its eighth allowed an exceptional depth of characterisation and more scope for UNIT to work as a concept.

Doctor Who and the Silurians was a successful popular seven-parter which combined all the elements of a well made well acted and well received show still just as compelling today as it was 14 years ago. The book of the serial in spite of being a rather remote research into television production is well worth reading. Retitled Doctor Who and the Cave Monsters it was penned by the great Malcolm Hulke himself and was one of his early Target novelisations. It remains alongside its television counterpart one of the best. ■

The Incredible MALCOLM HULKE

INTRODUCTION

"On the first of January 1958 I was with my friend Eric Paice. We regarded each other's receding hairlines and said 'We're not getting anywhere in this world.'

And so between them, they decided to change themselves and write a script together. Malcolme Mac Hulke had already written a thriller novel which had earned him about £18 and Paice had been responsible for a play that was being put on a great deal around the country by amateur theatres and no one else. Deciding that their skills lay in better directions they tried their hands at a play for television and shortly afterwards This Day In Fear about an ex IRA gunman living in Hendon and being pursued by his 'old friends', turned up on the doorstep of Redifusion Television and The British Broadcasting Corporation. Despite initial hopeful promises, Redifusion dropped it, leaving the BBC to pick up Malcolme Hulke had his first TV script accepted and was happy. With Eric Paice Mac carried on writing and between them they created for ABC TV (now Thames TV) a series called Pathfinders In Space a children's science fiction serial screened in the early 60s.

The man who originally commissioned the scripts was called Sydney Newman who after crossed to the BBC along with a young woman called Verity Lambert, and created Doctor Who.

BEYOND THE SUN

As the new BBC Drama serial was taking shape Mac now working on his own was asked to submit a script as to the story in the first series provisionally entitled The Hidden Planet.

It was about a planet which is the same size as Earth said Mac but on the other side of the sun and therefore we have never seen it. The Doctor goes to the planet and for obvious reasons the TARDIS crew think they are on Earth. But they find things are different. I think they land on a field and Susan noticed a four leaf clover and then they see they are all four leaf clovers. And then other mysterious things happen like birds flying backwards or having double wings and things of that sort."

Although he was asked to write it as a four part story, and got paid for it Mac's first Doctor Who never went into production the Daleks arrived in the second story and the emphasis of the series veered away from concepts like Mac's. As an interesting sideline the third story in fact was David Whitaker's Edge of Destruction which is often mistakingly called Beyond The Sun which Mac remembered as being the title of the first episode of The Hidden Planet perhaps that is where the confusion arises from.

FACELESS WONDERS

It was back as a co-venture that Mac's first script actually made the screen but not until after a lot of changes had been made. The Faceless Ones co written with David Ellis was a story about a race of creatures who, after a terrible holocaust on their home planet. have lost their individuality and decide to adopt human form.

Whilst the premise remained the same, their original story was set in a large department store with the aliens using window dummies as their temporary hosts until more suitable bodies came along.

The Big Store was written as a four part William Hartnell story, featuring the Doctor with his then new companions Ben and Polly. By the time it reached production Patrick Troughton had become the Second Doctor, Jamie had been rather abruptly introduced and, according to Mac, "With warm BBC approval we wrote the whole show out fully using all the standard characters of that period. The Producer then said Ben and Polly could only be in the first and last episodes. So we were paid more money and went back and rewrote the whole thing so that Ben and Polly got mesmerised about halfway through episode one and did not return until episode six and that seemed to suit the producer."

The character of Samantha Briggs was created to help Jamie and the Doctor her interest being that somewhere on one of the Chameleon Flights was her missing brother. Samantha Briggs was played by Pauline Collins who turned down the offer to make the character a regular and went on to be one of the original Liver Birds before making herself famous in Upstairs Downstairs. Mac remembered that Gerry Davis then the script writer had been very impressed. "Gerry

LANDLORDS AND TIMELORDS

At around that time Mac met a young copywr ter work ng n advert sing The young man had taken rooms in a flat of which Ma co m Hulke was the landlord The two wr ters became f rm fr ends and before too ong they wrote a couple of scripts together nclud ng The Avengers The second wr ter was Terrance D cks 'The great thing about Mac you see, from a technica po nt of view was that he was a touch typist He was always terribly effic ent and well organised a k nd of human machine and when he dec ded to be a wr ter the f rst thing he did was to go to typists schoo and learn shorthand and typing So the way we wou d work was th at Mac wou d sit at the typewriter and we'd discuss a l ne or whatever agree on t and zap , t wou d appear on the paper

Before too ong Terrance became a sort of unior scr pt ed tor on the sixth season of Doctor Who a season that had a rather troubled end. 'We got an important instruction ' said Ma com Hulke, " to f nd a way of changing Patrick Troughton's appearance bu t to eave it open as Jon Pertwee hadn t been cast We then came up with the idea of the Time Lords a very complicated way of do ng things rea ly suppose but it gave us a good few scenes about the Doctor s tr a and his sentence into ex e that was another thing Stories on Earth got h gher ratings so they wanted him ex ed to Earth for some reason or other and eft t to us to work t out I think it was qu te an nterest ng ob It was the sort of story you could stretch a though I th nk the rat ngs fe l off a b t towards the end

The War Games was the f rst of Mac s rea ly moral stories He had a reputation for being a very moral and dea ogica wr ter just the sort of person that new producer Barry Let s wanted n The War Games he and Terrance set out to show that war is a myth ng but a game contro led by unfeel ng masters who will use other nnocent part es to do the d rty work rather than get the r own hands mucky The A ens ed by the ev War Lord represented the powers that be and the Doctor and the T me Lords represented the mora and goodness n people

Sea Devils Trenchard's patriotism is his downfall — so dedicated to his country that he is easily taken in by the Master's tricks and later executed for it.

In the same story Mac uses the character of Walker as a cipher for all those politicians who claim to be doing their duty but in fact are just out for their own personal glory — the sort of character used a great deal during the Letts/Dicks/Pertwee era but never quite so perfectly as here. The next story Malcolm Hulke wrote was a direct attack on royalty almost racism using Xenophobia as the subject.

CARRINGTON OVER

'When I became script editor proper' says Terrance Dicks 'I kind of inherited this nightmare called Ambassadors of Death which was a good idea from David Whitaker who was an excellent writer but he had been mucked about so much he sort of lost heart and lost direction. He'd gone through so many changes of script and changes of brief it was originally a Troughton story! that he'd really lost his way. And it got to the stage where I decided I couldn't put him through any more re-writes because it just wasn't going to work and so I went to Barry and said that they must pay David off in full, for his six episodes although he'd probably written about thirty six by then — then we took the basic idea and turned it over to Mac. He came to it fresh and went on from there, and stretched it out by an episode for economy reasons.'

Ambassadors of Death is a story about one man's moral dilemma and how it becomes such an obsession he is in danger of destroying everything he so desperately wants to save. Even at the end when defeated and humiliated, General Carrington is led away and the Ambassadors released he turns to the Doctor and explains that he had to do what he did. He felt it was his moral duty, and the Doctor can only agree — he sees what Carrington was afraid of and why but as always the end rarely justifies the means. Carrington isn't a character hired by particular patriotism like Trenchard or Baker, but is actually motivated by fear — he is terrified that the Ambassadors have come to steal and kill. The fact that, unlike the other two, he doesn't die but is sadly and quietly led away indicates that Mac didn't see him as another ex-colonial soldier but as a straightforward enough man who has met his phobia of the unknown get to him.

Ambassadors during its seven episodes actually presents the viewer with a dazzling array of characters from the scheming Reegan who pretends stealing the killer aliens and perhaps raiding Fort Knox right down to the Eva nut toting Tallarian the scientist at the research centre taken over by Carrington who puts a gun on the Doctor and instantly becomes the centre of suspicion, which is why Reegan "removes" him. Exactly how much of Ambassadors of Death is David Whitaker and how much is Malcolm Hulke's impossible to tell but the influence of the latter is very obviously there.

UP AND UNDER

When Barry Letts and Terrance Dicks took over Doctor Who they inherited from the Sherwin Bryant team the UNIT set-up, with the Doctor exiled on Earth. One of the main objectives was to slowly but surely get the Doctor back where he belonged — having adventures in space and time, as the Radio Times were once fond of saying. Realising that it would be fatal to immediately unshackle such a successful team both from a viewer's point of view and from the actors and technicians Letts and Dicks chose to phase in the outer space stories utilising the concept of the Time Lords sending the Doctor on missions that according to Terrance Dicks they wouldn't want to dirty their own hands with.

So again Malcolm Hulke was brought in to do a story set on an alien planet but without an operable TARDIS. He chose to write a story about the Earth of the future and Earth so overcrowded and over developed that its people would risk everything just for a few square feet of land. Thus rather like the American frontiersmen humankind set out to colonise not the prairies but planets like Uxarieus.

However as with the Wild West explorers there were those determined to make their fortunes at whatever cost.

Colony In Space told of the struggle between the rather weary but dedicated colonists and the all powerful mining corporation IMC along with the Master (the first time Mac wrote for him) trying to steal the Doomsday Weapon from a race of primitives and hold the universe to ransom. Mac's vision here of the Earth as an overcrowded polluted open cast dump was one he later re-used in Frontier in Space where the political messages came through thicker — the moral message here unfortunately got lost in a script which actor Tony Caunter (who played the sadistic Morgan) regards as cowboys and indians in outer space and not a lot else.

It was also Mac's least favourite of his scripts and he took the opportunity in his book version (see later in this issue) to expand on the society and culture of the era. Having got the Doctor off to an alien world Mac's next script a year later took him to the other extreme, back on Earth — or rather under the Earth, with the marine cousins of the Silurians, The Sea Devils. And here was where the bonus came in for the production office when asked if they could borrow a bit of land (and sea, to film in around Portsmouth the Royal Navy offered to lend whatever was needed to help promote themselves – a sort of action-packed recruitment film. Thus apart from the monsters and the imprisoned Master, Mac also had to incorporate a diving bell, a submarine, hovercraft, experimental speedboats and a platoon of gun toting ratings.

The popularity of the Sea Devils and Silurians never waned and since their tv appearance in 1972 they have since returned both in comic strip form in Doctor Who Monthly and recently on television in Johnny Byrne's Warriors of the Deep.

MORE REPTILES

'The BBC said to me "We've just had a whole load of models of space ships from a Lew Grade show on TV. We can paint 'em up different colours — can you write a story which will use them?"' Terrance Dicks claims that whilst it wasn't quite as straightforward as that — they wanted to do a hardware story and asked Visual Effects if it was possible — who then picked up the models from ITC and so on — that was certainly the genesis of Frontier In Space a story that mixed the ecological warning of Colony in Space with the very strong anti war theme first suggested in The War Games.

Apart from the Ogrons brought in as a subtle hint to viewers about the return of the Daleks the story featured a race of aliens called Draconians which apart from being Jon Pertwee's favourite aliens Mac professed a liking for them writing in lines which he described as very 28▶

Janet Fielding

'A mouth on legs'

by Richard Marson

Way back in issue 64 of Doctor Who Monthly as it then was we presented an interview with the Doctor's latest companion Tegan Jovanka, and as of course the charming and talented Janet Fielding. We're delighted to renew acquaintance with one of the most popular of companions, who appeared in all but two of Peter Davison's many stories.

Cast as a Australian air hostess, Janet was actually born in Brisbane in 1957 and her original ambition was to become a reporter for Australia's ABC news. But after her first real experience of acting at the University of Queensland, Janet's plans changed towards becoming a professional actress. "I came over to England in 1977 and haven't been back since – at least not with any intention of returning permanently to my roots. My family are all academically inclined. When I decided to act and to go to England my mother was absolutely horrified."

Janet was already experienced in fringe theatre when she was offered the part of Tegan but television was a new foray for her. "I think John (Nathan Turner) had actually cast me when he saw me so was surprised to say the least that I landed the part. I'm grateful to him even now, especially as I wouldn't think of myself as obvious casting."

"I wondered if it was her qualities as an Australian as well as an actress that might have made up his mind for him. Janet agreed. "I don't think it's a cliche to say that Australians are very brash, very forthright people. I think it tends to be true of me as well as Tegan so I suppose that's one reason. My accent had, after a while, worn off though. I just suppose it's the quantesheleton I offered as an actress."

Three years and seventy episodes later, could Janet see why Tegan had remained so consistently popular with viewers? "I think it's because she was so brash. She was quite aggressive although this was naturally toned down as we went along. It was possible for a lot of people to identify with her because the Doctor is in some ways an irritating character. You can imagine being with the Doctor and getting fed up with his whimsicality but at the same time loving him enormously because of his charisma. She gave voice to that feeling to the viewer. Tegan was also practical when it came to getting down to things even if she wasn't always right."

Had Janet Fielding herself found Tegan's persona at all annoying? "Mainly the lack of intelligence. After a while, too, I began to get very repetitious. I did have a lot of fun though especially with stories like Kinda and then Snakedance. Funny that they're my favourites! She laughed. "It was nice to get Tegan out of her character strut and hair-do things a bit. I could do some underplaying instead of the same old exaggerations. Characters don't always do well in Doctor Who so I was lucky with those two. After Snakedance I never got such a good opportunity again, sadly."

I disagree slightly on this point, referring to some particularly subtle work that Janet had achieved in subsequent stories like Terminus especially in episode one and the superb Enlightenment. These had surely allowed just as excellent a characterisation of Tegan?

"I don't know. I did think Enlightenment was a good script but I wasn't a huge fan of Terminus as I was very hard work. I used to like a Eric Saward's scripts because I'm sure I'm a good straight adventure writer. I really think he's brilliant."

The stories that Janet didn't like were nothing to do with the actual roles she was given more with the circumstances in which they were made. "I didn't like my first two stories – Castrovalva or Four to Doomsday largely because I was busy finding my feet. It's difficult to enjoy something which you're totally unaccustomed to. They were consequently very taxing in that respect."

Character development in fact comes up against tradition and argues pointing back to the origins of the show's structure. "The format goes back such a long way – over twenty years – and don't we know it! It's how more than ever but I'd like me scripting for more of a character element. Television itself has changed. It can be more subtle, more effective than it used to be when companions were simply ciphers. Though Peter's first story had some lovely stuff for Nyssa (Sarah Sutton) which was great to see that happening so early on. I think for the avid viewers of the programme the regulars are a terribly important element of the plot and they often suffer in comparison with the story line. Mark Strickson felt this, which is why he left. He wasn't being given enough to do. Tegan tended to overshadow the other characters because she was easier to write for, even though Sarah Sutton had some lovely things to do as well. Matthew Waterhouse used to find the situation and the part he was playing not as difficult but frustrating too.

Then Janet was asking for more sophistication to be added to the show. Didn't she recognise the risk of alienating the notoriously conservative audiences?

It's funny that because when the season reviews for Kinda came out and we got the reaction of the fanzines it didn't do very well. I couldn't understand that. When we'd picked up that script we said 'This is terribly imaginative, an amazing script with some super ideas. So maybe you're right.'

Looking at her career outside the programme, did Janet feel that playing Tegan for such a long time might prove damaging? God knows what its long-term effect will be. You do tend to get people thinking of you in terms of Australian parts. I'm always been seen to play Australians and which that's useful, unfortunately, scores don't want to play them all the time. The play I'm currently in, The Collector, is a part I've always wanted to play. It's more or less a two-hander and it's a change in the right direction. If you think, wouldn't I have had a challenge like this Doctor Who, then you're dead right. That's putting it mildly.

Certainly since leaving the cast Janet has had absolutely no problem finding work. On the contrary she's had more problems trying to get time off. I haven't stopped working. I did an episode of Minder, then went to America for the fan convention which was a real eye-opener. After that I was straight into pantomime, Aladdin, until January when I went up to Central Television in Nottingham to start work on a series for them called Murphy's Mob which I'd already completed as it's still rebounding. Now I'm heavily involved in The Collector which is literally been one thing after another. I'm very encouraging because it's usual to be unemployed for a long time after doing a series.

Most fans had no doubt that Janet would have a successful career once she'd left Doctor Who and there are a great many of the fans about both British and American. It's the fantasy element that appeals, I think. The total escapism. The American way of treatment is wonderful. Janet broke off suddenly. You say she did an episode of Minder, then went to America for the convention which was a real eye-opener. After that I was straight into pantomime, Aladdin, until January when I went up to Central Television in Nottingham to start work on a series for them called Murphy's Mob which I'd already completed as it's still rebounding. Now I'm heavily involved in The Collector which is literally been one thing after another. I'm very encouraging because it's usual to be unemployed for a long time after doing a series.

Most fans had no doubt that Janet would have a successful career once she'd left Doctor Who and there are a great many of the fans needed my free time for them, not for answering fanmail appreciated though it is. The girls used to help me – they loved doing it. They'd address and open envelopes, I'd read them and sign the cards and then they'd post them. I went down to Cassie's school and found this huge reception of kids all eager to see Tegan – it was great. You tend to take Doctor Who home with you, however much you try to separate the two.

While with the programme, Janet worked with a whole host of guest stars. 'You can't call yourself an actor if you haven't done Doctor Who! Everybody who is anybody has.' Michael Gough, Bery Reid – they've done it, and they were all absolutely marvellous. We've had some really big names.

As well as the many visiting actors, Janet worked alongside two of the series' Doctors – not counting The Five Doctors – when she established a rapport with the First Doctor. What had been the differences she observed between Tom Baker and Peter Davison?

'I was full of admiration for Tom with that last one. Right up until the end he was constantly inventive, he worked very hard and had a lot of enthusiasm. Obviously I didn't get to know him very well – he was thinking about leaving mainly and after all seven years is a very, very long time. Peter's character was more vulnerable, more fallible, so that was one immediate difference, whereas Tom had been more flamboyant. Peter loved – he was always a lot of fun, very considerate and very hard working.

'I have been surprised at the reaction to Peter's decision to leave the series. I became known for ever pretending to do three years, just like Patrick Troughton – I think that because Tom did it for so long people expected Peter to stay as well. Having worked with the new Doctor, Colin Baker, I can say he's really lovely to be around. It's been a tremendous challenge.

As memories go, the whole 19th year has certainly been the most memorable and significant to date. Yet the 20th season of the programme found itself threatened by the viewers' worst enemy – strikes. We had one when we should have been doing Enlightenment, and so we lost the Black Guardian story which wasn't originally written out. It finished before the latest one and so I didn't affect me but I know they only just finished this last series.

Even so, strikes didn't prevent The Five Doctors from going ahead, perhaps the highlight of the year's celebrations. You may not be aware that Janet had a good part – liked that. Janet laughed. 'It was particularly nice to work with a number of the others who all said the same things about the show, how they felt that they became assistants and how frustrating it was. They all felt not enough had been attempted with their characters. Of all of them I'm Sladen and I tend to be compared and we get on very well together. She and I, timewise, are about the longest serving – maybe that's why. People think we're alike too. The Five Doctors was a bandwagon.'

One thing that Janet doesn't find enjoyable is watching her own performances from the other side of the camera. 'I thought it was awful – there were very few things that I was really pleased with. I tend to see there's an acting myself but I don't think that's anything new – almost every actor's like that.

When making the programme, Janet did try to keep doing other work as well, but it wasn't easy. 'I said if ultimately things ended up like breaks in didn't do it. You do get offered things and inevitably they do overlap. I did think of leaving earlier due to this but they persuaded me to stay on.

'I have very serious memories of these years during a beautiful genuine 1920s night to Black Orchid. I loved doing the Carnation

What [illegible] was [illegible] were [illegible] Bad Fruit [illegible] in the form of Stephen Fry [illegible] this year's Summer Special. Before this [illegible] early didn't know a [illegible] were [illegible] a [illegible] Jovial Howard who said: They like you, you have. So that was the first thing we did as we [illegible] Chris or [illegible] and [illegible] with laughter and [illegible] and [illegible] like everyone.

The first T-shirt image was the well-known [illegible] and we [illegible] Doctor Who? logo. The first design we got for this T-shirt was a [illegible] that was [illegible] had to spend hours [illegible] on. We printed quite a few thousand of them and yet only [illegible] been the most popular of our Doctor Who designs.

A couple of years later we produced a new T-shirt design using the photographic process popular today and the K-9 and Company [illegible] Again the [illegible] was quite new and we were really pressed with that. We were among the new people to use it because [illegible] thing that is very difficult to print [illegible] and once it's dry it stays in shape no matter how much you wash it. We sold an awful lot of this one which was very rewarding.

Although Tom Baker's Doctor was always the most [illegible] and we [illegible] Doctor Who logo. The first design we got for this T-shirt was a [illegible] that was [illegible] had to spend hours [illegible] on. We printed quite a few thousand of them and yet only [illegible] been the most popular of our Doctor Who designs.

A couple of years later we produced a new T-shirt design using the photographic process popular today and the K-9 and Company [illegible] Again the [illegible] was quite new and we were really pressed with that. We sold an awful lot of this one which was very rewarding.

Although Tom Baker's Doctor was always the most [illegible] and we [illegible] by the young Peter Davison. Hence the [illegible] appearance of a Peter Davison T-shirt although as many [illegible] and [illegible] have [illegible], Davison's star [illegible] bright [illegible] over all he was a [illegible] way [illegible] one [illegible] finally got approval was [illegible] best [illegible] was who actually did [illegible] to get [illegible] exactly right he had to make it as strong as possible you know he had to look important in the [illegible]

The next idea [illegible] upon was to [illegible] he hit [illegible] for recent [illegible] cybermen and make two new [illegible] Rod was a cyberman T-shirt and a Cyberman mask used on Richard [illegible] equally [illegible] Sadly [illegible] wasn't quite as [illegible] as they had expected [illegible] once [illegible] Cybermasks. The [illegible] one was a sort of [illegible] which we [illegible] have been made from a moulded [illegible] for Richard [illegible] original. But the [illegible] soaking up [illegible] assembling the necessary [illegible] many [illegible] the masks made [illegible] and we had to abandon the idea. up to London so that Rod could put the sticky tape on the back but unfortunately he couldn't collect them from the Red Star parcels office at Paddington in time for the impending Longleat convention. So we only had about a hundred at that event and they went like hot cakes. The rest spent the weekend with British Rail and we haven't been able to sell them since.

The Cybermen T-shirts do after showing early promise haven't realised their full commercial potential. "We thought the Cybermen would be good to do but people tend to be fans of the series as a whole rather than of one particular aspect of it. Our Postman Pat T-shirts will appeal to just about any child and their mums will buy that but you're getting into minorities with things like the Cybermen so you narrow the numbers.

Nevertheless Image have prepared a magnificent new Dalek T-shirt for release for which they have justifiably high hopes. Using the old comic strip progo it features the eponymous evil creatures literally blasting out of a hail of red fire. As well as being extraordinarily eye-catching, it also expresses the essence of the show: the real impact. Not surprisingly the firm hope it will not go the same way as the Cybermen T-shirts which sell steadily but unspectacularly. We hope everybody will want the Dalek ones. We think it's a great design and everyone so far has liked them.

Surely people must now be asking for a Colin Baker T-shirt? How long will it be before the sixth Doctor is available from Image? "We're going to wait a while and see how he's accepted. Personally like him but obviously I have to have a more commercial way of looking at it than he fans. What we are thinking of doing very vaguely is a design featuring Colin in front of the other five Doctors. We want it to be different and not just another Davison style design.

Asked Image about their ambitions for the future. "We'd fail again if we kept up the pace we were working at even a year ago. Situations still crop up where rapid overt me is required. As for the future output is at a nice level. We do a lot of BBC merchandising so we have very high ambitions in that field. Postman Pat, Morph, Grandpa etc. We could get a lot more in here if we needed to. We're growing slowly but we're growing.

A short car journey away from Image Merchandising lies Richard Gregory's Imagineering Company which deals with a very different kind of product from its sister firm. For it is here that many of the programme's most famous monsters, costumes and props are designed and made. This was not our first visit: the company were interviewed in issue 72 of Doctor Who Magazine when they were working on the early stories of the twentieth season. Since then they have taken on a lot more work.

The key man at Imagineering is converted mill base ist he hardworking and dedicated Richard Gregory who let us into a few of the trade secrets of the show. Richard known as Greg to his friends was frank and amusing about his ideas recognising that time and money constraints sometimes made these less than they might have been. I think Doctor Who needs that appreciation - certainly it needs constant creativity - try to keep my mind wiped clean from what we've done before and come up with something different. What's important above all else is to get a practical satisfactory idea working in the studio on time. You can afford to go on thinking of contrast new ideas because they won't produce the goods - it's very much a compromise between what you want to achieve and the time you've been given to achieve it.

Usually Richard works in very close consultation with the costume department, visual effects and, to a lesser extent, the director of the story. Our first contact was through Odile Dicks-Mireaux one of the BBC's costume designers - it's a give-and-take situation really. The costume designer will receive the script first read and then say what characters have to be created. The we work on the script as well and the problems that arise we can then throw around between us. With Resurrection of the Daleks we had to design the Dalek troopers costumes and new style helmets complete with Dalek style eyestalk came from the designer and the director for example.

"What happens after we've read the script is that we all meet to discuss ideas. They look at us and whatever innovations we can come up with on Earthshock was some redesign that we had a very early meeting with costume and about six weeks which on Doctor Who is a very long time to produce the sonic lances, the troopers uniforms and the spacesuits worn by the crew members of the freighter.

One specialist on Richard's work entirely was the visual effects department in the creation of one of the most memorable of recent monsters.

The story was The Awakening and the monster the evil Malus. There was no involvement with Costume on that at all. We created both the large head and the smaller animated puppet. I did think the small version could have been used more. It moved quite well and here was a lot to get out of. The idea was a base for Malus on the old concept of the device and the thing itself was operated in the studio by Visual Effects.

Having created costumes and/or monsters for such diverse stories as Four to Doomsday (Castrovalva, Time Flight the two headed dragon was operated by Richard himself and The Visitation was magnificent) immediately in time to work on the twentieth season. We started Peter Davison's second year by doing all the armour, helmets and some of the props for Snakedance. We weren't responsible for the snake, though. Next came Art of Infinity and then the vapir armour for Terminus designed by Image Merchandise artist. And vast Enlightenment required us to produce a set of spacesuits and The King's Demons featured Kamelion which was designed by one of our associates Chris Padmore. So you could say we did quite a bit, yes.

I asked Richard about the similarities between the two species of android he built for Earthshock and The Caves of Androzani. The similarity wasn't deliberate. The android heads evolved into a shape we thought would be typical of an android. Both versions were based on a human face, even though they lacked any human features, so they obviously going to look similar, though actually the two were dimensionally completely different.

Earthshock, Imagineering's biggest job to date is, not surprisingly, Richard's favourite. "It's due to the Cybermen, they've been the most demanding and the most rewarding. They were such a well established character that we had to be very careful what we did with them. We had to create a 1980s character for a monster with its roots in the 1960s. Ninety per cent of it was memory, mental reaction to what I'd seen as a kid, while the rest of it was based on the 1970s suits of their last appearance, to the extent of actually using parts of those costumes. The moving mouthpiece idea came from John Nathan-Turner's desire to produce some sort of image-reminder that the Cybermen were once human.

Richard is delighted that the Cybermen are returning next season to confront and confuse new Doctor Colin Baker and his Valian assistant Peri. He wasn't revealing anything about the story but he did admit. "We'll have to come up with some replacements for the ones destroyed in The Five Doctors. I'd like to see them develop more part of the thing with the Cybermen has been that every time they've appeared, they've been slightly different. We've made the bodies much more technical looking now. I'd like to see them become even more menacing.

What had been Richard's highest budget so far on the series? "Probably The Visitation. We spent a lot of time creating the Terileptils. As far as budgeting is concerned, the more monsters you produce the cheaper it works out. The current average is about four. One prop the BBC didn't use was some fibreglass belts we'd made to the troopers. They might have been dangerous with the stunts being performed so in the end they were shelved.

Safety is a prime concern of monster-makers. There is also the comfort of the actor to be considered when constructing costumes. Realism often requires them to suffer one way or another. "We get actors complaining, understandably, at every fitting that they're uncomfortable or that they can't see. The basic aim is to make them as habitable as possible. I would never make a costume for anyone that I wouldn't wear myself.

"Part of the difficulty comes when you're working with an actor rather than a mime artist. You have to be able to design a costume to become an extension of the actor inside because they want to be able to use their talent. It helps to make a monster more realistic if the actor is happy with it, but this puts great demands on the budget. On a film you might have weeks to develop something around the actor.

Often the first time Doctor Who actors get into a monster costume is on the studio floor and by then it's too late for more than minor modifications.

The most time-consuming costumes tend to be those that involve a vast amount of latex work which means moulding everything from scratch. The Gastropods are a case in point. The problem with them was to make believable creatures – a mix of human and slug – which were also flexible enough for the actors to bend in and move slightly. We made three Gastropods for The Two Doctors – their backs were made of glass fibre which was also used to support the structure while latex was used to build upon and modify the basic plaster cast costumes.

The painstaking process of making monsters was highlighted even more by Imagineering's work on Warriors of the Deep. 'We made Sea Devils and Silurians for that one. The Sea Devils were essentially the same as before – moulded from originals – but there was a modification of the fins at the back. Originally too they weren't going to be seen in their helments, but this was changed.'

The Silurians, on the other hand, were completely redesigned with the BBC visual Department sculpting the heads. They were deliberately made pot bellied on the instructions of John Nathan-Turner and the costume designer because the originals looked very much like men in rubber suits. They like the idea of giving them chubbier, more reptilian bodies. We were given basic sketches to work from which is normal practice – and there was very much down to us to interpret them as we felt best.

The finished effect was extremely impressive. There has been some criticism however of the somewhat plasticky shine on the Silurian and Tereleptil costumes. Could this not be avoided? 'There are sprays to matte surfaces down but with the Silurians we used gels to make the bodies look more reptilian. We do the dressings on the studio floor though, and the lights make the suits look different – we do our best but it's all down time again.'

A man whose energy seems boundless, Richard Gregory is kept busy all the time. Recent work includes the films Superman II and the cult movie Xtro. He even designed the Lirpaloo – the four-foot high dogape creature seen on Esther Rantzen's That's Life April Fool spoof this year. Small wonder then that a company with so many fingers in so many different pies has been so successful. Whatever else happens in this uncertain world, one thing is sure – Imagineering will be at work again, producing a whole new range of costumes, props and monsters to furnish the universe in our next encounter with Doctor Who. ■

RANDOM QUESTION

ON TARGET

THE DOCTOR stopped Bessie at the crest of a hill, got out his map and began to study it. He said, "You're sure this is Wenley Moor?"

"Positive." Liz had navigated their journey all the way from UNIT in London. Now the Doctor seemed to prefer to take over. She pointed to the ridge. "I think it must be over there."

The Doctor produced a compass, took a reading. "We have to be sure," he said.

"I got you all the way through the London traffic," Liz said. "Up the M1 and off at the right exit."

"You did very well," he said, not really listening. He made a calculation on the edge of the map. "It must be," he said, making his calculation, "in a perfectly straight line – there." He pointed, straight at the ridge.

"That's what I said."

"Did you?" He put the map away and started the engine again. They shot forward. "I rather like map reading."

Liz said nothing. They roared along, not speaking, until the road went along at the foot of the rising ridge of land. In a very determined way Liz said, "It's that track over there." She pointed to a gravel road that led up the hill from the main road. The Doctor slowed down, reaching for the map again. "Well, better safe than sorry."

"Over there," she screamed. "That rough track. I've studied the route thoroughly."

The Doctor stopped the car, then turned gently to Liz. "Do I irritate you?"

"No, Doctor," Liz said. "You are the most thoughtful and considerate scientist I have ever worked with."

He beamed, taking her quite seriously. "How very kind of you. I hope that our association together will be a long and happy one."

Liz closed her eyes to stop herself from screaming again. "Yes, Doctor, let's hope it is."

It's passages like the above that make the Target novelisations by Malcolm Hulke so popular. His ability to develop his characters and give the reader such a clear insight into the characters' minds show what they are thinking and doing and make you either like them or loathe them. In The Doomsday Weapon Hulke spends three whole pages which, on the one hand, bring the reader up to date on Mr Jo Grant, Captain Jack and how MI5 works, ending with the wonderfully happy and secure thought that he was an MI5 man, with an MI5 wife, MI5 children, with a beautiful four-roomed MI5 home. His present and his future were as secure as MI5 and MI5 would go on forever. As it turns out, Dent's future is neither secure and presumably when he returns to Earth MI5 won't lift a finger to help him reconstructing such an ironic and cynical approach to Dent's life and character. You come away from just those three pages feeling that you know Jack Dent in fact you've known him for years as opposed to a few hundred words' worth of book. Mr Hulke has an amazing ability to judge his readers so that he cares about his people whether good or bad. Simply by getting the reader into their minds in The Cave Monsters Liz Shaw seems positively hateful towards the Doctor, he's made arrogant and unhelpful, and likewise she feels frustrated and bitter embittered towards him not only as they drive to Wenley Moor but all the very start of the book as she delivers the Brigadier's summons to him.

"Tell him this: do not report myself."

anywhere. Particularly not forthwith.

The Doctor sat back inside the car, looked down at his long legs and either kicked one instead she said, "It's just his way of putting things."

Hulke's way of having a character think one thing about someone and then say another opposite is a trait that runs through most of his books and is an appealing aspect of the reader not only what the characters are like as people or what they feel or in this case don't feel towards each other.

Whitaker looked over the control equipment, had read the suitcase. "I don't know, we'll need so many things, we don't have room, only de-"

"It isn't easy getting this stuff for you. Everytime I go out on the streets I risk being shot as a looter."

Professor Whitaker stepped back from the open suitcase. "If you're going to make a big thing of it, let's forget the entire project."

Butler would very much have liked to batter Professor Whitaker's head a pulp. He sighed and said, "You will have your little joke, Professor. Don't take me seriously."

But Whitaker was sulking. "I know when I'm not wanted. It's such a problem to provide me with the equipment that's vital for Operation Golden Age, you only have to say."

"I'm very sorry for what I just said. Professor. Will you be kind enough to accept my sincere and most abject apologies?"

Professor Whitaker regarded him for half a minute. Then the sulker of a smile. "You really are sorry?"

"Yes," said Butler, wishing he could divert his fist into Whitaker's pale face and break all his teeth. "I really am terribly sorry. Obviously you must have all the equipment that you need for the great experiment which only you can carry out."

The fact that Whitaker is a conceited and very vain person is obvious and what the above shows is not only Butler's intense hatred of the man but disgust at the lengths he'll go to see the project through whatever the depths of crawling he has to get it done. One thing it is any writer's duty to do in a book is to give his characters backbone and as we said he does this with no problem but a lot of motivation. There is no radical portrayal of the TV version of Invasion of the Dinosaurs of why Butler is a baddy. His character in the book is a great deal stronger but here he is given a brief moment of pathos that at least gives him a sympathy towards the end of the book. Sarah suggests rather unkindly that Butler could almost be good looking if it wasn't for the jagged scar down his face suggesting that he must like it. Perhaps it makes him look tough. She asks if he got it fighting and he says that it was when he was a London firefighter and in rescuing a little girl from a blazing house he fell thirty feet through a plate glass window. In an instant the author has given us an insight into Butler and while you can condone his actions with Operation Golden Age it is possible to feel a slight sympathy with him.

MALCOLM HULKE

Of course the scar wasn't purely a device to give humane lines to Butler – on TV Martin Jarvis's famous features were not marked at all. Malcolm Hulke explains: "There are technical differences between writing for television and writing a book and there are many occasions where you have to make alterations, for example in television you can see, in a book you can't. So in Invasion of the Dinosaurs on one occasion (Butler) had to plant a bomb or something in an underground. Now on television you could actually see who was doing it but in the book (and remember that chapters are written from what we call the point of view of an angle character) that part of the book was being viewed through the eyes of the Doctor who could just see someone was doing this. Now I couldn't say in that chapter Butler came along... because the Doctor wouldn't know what his name was so I gave him a very bad, livid scar down his cheek, so I could say The Doctor could see a man with a livid scar, etc, etc, and the reader immediately thinks 'My God! That's Butler. We know Butler!' You see because we've already made the scar thing and that's one of the technical points you have to consider in making adaptations from one medium to another."

Another book where Mac Hulke does something rather unusual is his adaptation of Robert Sloman's The Green Death. The only time Mac didn't write up one his stories: originally asked to write it by Target, Barry Letts didn't have the time and suggested to Terrance Dicks – then Target's main link with the Doctor Who world – that Mac ought to write it up as the subject matter was of the sort he liked. Both Letts and Hulke have a deep sense of morality and the motivation behind Sloman's TV script (which was Letts' idea in the first place) appealed greatly to Mac. In this there is, of course, his usual development of characters after they've only been on the page for a few lines – viz his descriptions of Hinks reading American comic books: He preferred pictures to words because he could not read very fast. He was just about to turn the page that carried the first picture of the torture sequence when an alarm buzzer started to bleep... Still, the comic would be there when he got back and he hadn't yet got to the pictures of people being beaten and burned, so he had something to look forward to. And then there's the maggot, a "character" to which Mac devotes a fair amount of pages developing, giving it a motivation, feelings and needs that never could possibly be realised on the television show: "In the books I think you can emphasize that sort of thing, make the position clearer whereas in TV there's a problem with what I'd call "chatty monsters". You see, if yo've got to bring out people's characters they've got to talk and it does become a bit quaint if a couple of Silurians start swapping childhood reminiscences about their school days. Whereas in the book you can go into people's minds without ever saying a wood – therefore it's easier to get across characterisation in a book especially with a human being, but it's a darn sight easier if you're dealing with a monster or a maggot or a dog. After all in a book you can go into the mind of what a dog is thinking whereas you can't really do that on television. All you can do on TV is show that it is a yappy dog or a docile dog or a friendly dog (that's if you can cast a dog that's going to do all these things!) but you can't really go into its mind, but in a book there's no limit to what you can do." Mac is also very meticulous with his books – he compiles a chart or graph as he goes along marking in all the climaxes and then the calm patches to the very page, comparing with the TV original, even writing which days he would write which chapters (he wrote The Sea Devils between 3rd and 12th of January 1974 at an approximate rate of fifteen pagers per day).

His attention to detail can also help to get across an important scene – whereas in many books the shooting of the Chief Sea Devil would probably have read something like Petty Officer Myers entered the storeroom and shot the Chief Sea Devil dead Mac, not afraid to use his word count to the maximum explains that the last sentence the Sea Devil speaks ends rather abruptly because a bullet from a .44 service rifle travelling at three times the speed of sound, and fired by one Petty Officer Myers had just entered and destroyed its brain. The Chief Sea Devil fell backwards, dead before its huge body hit the floor. Petty Officer Myers stood in the doorway and lowered his rifle. "Is one of you gentlemen the Doctor?"

"I am," said the Doctor, "What's happened?"

"All these creepy crawlie things had some sort of fit," said the petty officer.

Malcolm Hulke certainly had no qualms about changing things in his books – whilst The Cave Monsters bears only a basic resemblance to Doctor Who and The Silurians, The Doomsday Weapon keeps fairly close to its Colony In Space original except in the beginning. When these early books were written it wasn't expected that a whole series would be made of them – thus, rather like David Whittaker had re-written The Daleks to introduce Ian and Barbara, so Mac rewrote Jo's introduction. In The Doomsday Weapon Miss Grant knows nothing of Autons, Mind Parasites, Axons or the Master – she is very new to UNIT, and very mistrustful of the Doctor – not realising he isn't exactly a human being. At least Jo got her voice back. "How can it be bigger inside than out?"

"The TARDIS is dimensionally transcendental," said the Doctor, busy with his work. Whatever he was doing, he seemed satisfied with his own work. He straightened up. "As of this moment," he said, "I think my exile on Earth may be over"

"Your exile on Earth?" Jo was seriously worried about this strange man's sanity.

"In Frontier In Space I had to link (the TV version) to the story going out immediately afterwards. Now there's a different story construction necessary for the book because I had no guarantee that the reader would promptly read the next book, so I had to change the end," so when at the end of Frontier In Space we see the Doctor try to attack the Master and get shot, he is led by Jo into the TARDIS and calls on the Time Lords before collapsing into a coma. In The Space War Mac has the Master accepting defeat and allowing the Doctor to go chasing after the Daleks in his own time. "Well," said the Master, "you only have to squeeze the trigger"

"You know that I couldn't kill you," said the Doctor. "Perhaps I should take you prisoner and return you to serve your prison sentence on Earth. But there's something more important for me to do at the moment."

"What's that?"

"To go after the Daleks," The Doctor closed the door of the TARDIS, the Master watched as it dematerialised, then he went back to his table and started to collect his star charts and other papers. "Oh well," he said to himself, "there's always tomorrow."

In 1979 after a long gap Malcolm Hulke, at Terrance Dicks' suggestion, returned to Target to pen the novelisation of The War Games – condensing ten episodes into 143 pages – a task that was neither easy nor, as he was rather ill at the time, particularly fun. He seemed to recover from his illness and said of the book later "I was surprised how much more there was in part ten than I'd imagined, because there's a whole sequence where the Doctor tries to escape from the Time Lords, which he almost gets away with. Then when he is captured and put on trial there's an adjournment or something and he tries to escape again. So there was quite a lot in part ten, I was quite surprised. I thought 'Good gracious, did we write all this?'. The War Games was published shortly after Mac's tragic death in July 1979, not his best book by any means, and, sadly, not a fitting tribute to a man who both as script writer and novelist gave a great deal to Doctor Who and is sadly missed. At the time of his death he was intending to novelise The Faceless Ones and perhaps The Ambassadors of Death might have followed, but whatever he didn't manage to do the fact is that he did write some of the most original, entertaining and successful books in the entire range.

DEDICATED TO THE MEMORY OF MALCOLM "MAC" HULKE.

THE TWIN DILEMMA

REVIEW BY GARY RUSSELL

THE POWER OF THE DALEKS, Spearhead From Space, Robot, Castrovalva and now The Twin Dilemma, five of the most important stories in the history of Doctor Who — each introducing to the public a new version of the Doctor. In the Dalek story producer Innes Lloyd chose to cover the change by bringing back "everyone's favourite meanies" and giving them Radio Times coverage.

When Jon Pertwee assumed the role producer Derrick Sherwin hid the drastic change under a horror story — the public would be so aghast at seeing shop window dummies coming to life that the new Doctor was almost secondary to the plot.

When Tom Baker arrived Barry Letts opted to bury the alteration with a typical UNIT story.

In Castrovalva current producer John Nathan-Turner devoted a whole four part story to the regeneration, a regeneration gone wrong.

The Twin Dilemma was in many ways similar to the character of the new Doctor, a fair mixture of all that had gone before. The first episode had the immediate effects of the change, a majority of the twenty-five minutes based in the TARDIS itself, then the second episode concentrated more on the story proper. The third episode was nearly all story and then the final episode rushed everything into an action-packed climax and by the very end the sixth Doctor seemed settled in and Peri — and the viewers — had accepted him.

In many ways, The Twin Dilemma was a throwback to the mid-Tom Baker years, when Graham Williams first took on the mantle of producer. The structure of the episodes was very obvious with its setting up in the first, investigate in the second, run around (and achieve relatively little) in the third and then cram all the explanations into the last ten minutes of episode four, kill off the baddies (and the obligatory good guy) and go home happy. The Twin Dilemma's low placing in this year's Season Survey is probably due to this more than anything else — the story was too typical of a style that was once scorned as tedious and predictable, it contained gruesome monsters, a misguided goodie, a couple of innocents caught up in the plot and the young male "hero". The plot devices of The Pirate Planet or Underworld with the atmosphere of The Horns of Nimon.

As a story, The Twin Dilemma plodded on at a necessary simplistic rate — trying not to divert the viewer's attention from the new Doctor but still acting as a good back-up to get the TARDIS crew occupied, and was not displeasing, explaining how a giant, and rather squashy, slug wants to move a couple of planets out of their orbits and move them nearer a sun, and so with the help of a redundant, retired Time Lord who used to be in charge of Jaconda and a couple of Earthly twins called Womulus and Wemus (sic) whose mathematical skills are admired but never used, sets out to do his dirty work.

Enter a newly regenerated Doctor complete with "yuk" costume and a mistrusting Peri in an equally yuk costume, teaming up with a battered Lt Hugo Land in the yukkiest costume of the lot and things start moving. Colin Baker's first 90 minutes of playing the Doctor were nothing short of splendid — deliberately over the top at times (presumably that will have gone next year when he has settled in completely), ranting and raving his quotes from Longfellow and Shakespeare and throttling Peri as and when the moment seemed appropriate. His looks of hurt or disgust as Peri discussed his predecessor, his new costume and his morals were a joy to watch and his whole appearance seemed to reek of a determination to be good and enjoyable. With Colin Baker it looks as if the next few years are going to be some of the best the programme has seen, and that can only be a good omen for the continued success of the show. All it needs is a move back to Saturdays . . .

On the guest star front, Kevin McNally and Maurice Denham were both mildly disappointing — neither seemed keen to put a great deal of effort into what they did — whether this was because the script didn't allow room for much development or whether they simply did not want to take the emphasis away from the Doctor, but whatever the reasons, it seems a shame as the actual storyline sadly was not strong enough to allow for any slackness. Edwin Richfield did his best under the obviously restrictive costume of Mestor — in fact the Gastropods weren't the best monsters of the season by a long way, looking halfway between a cheap Tractator from Frontios and a fat Menoptera from The Web Planet all those years ago.

The Jacondans, however, were superb, and well deserve a second go — especially if led by the squirming Chancellor played so wonderfully by Seymour Green. Overall, as an end to the 21st season Doctor Who, and as an introduction to the Colin Baker era of the series, The Twin Dilemma was lacking that one ingredient that put almost every other story this season above it — flair, style and novelty. Colin Baker carried it magnificently enough to make it worth watching but in years to come Anthony Steven's actual story is unlikely to be remembered as a classic — or particularly good — adventure.

A Twin Dilemma for Colin Baker as the Doctor?
Opposite: Two portraits of Kevin McNally as Lt Hugo Land, and a couple of Jacondans
